ith the continuation of global communication and travel, more and more companies are shifting from just targeting their local markets to targeting the international market. However, if you are marketing your products globally you have to be cautious and aware of the differences in language and culture. A word in English might have a completely different meaning in Spanish that could be harmful to your company—s reputation.

'Globalization is extremely important for your company to expand and to reach other markets,

Important reference

Some tips regarding globalization

- Take notice of local sites

Really understand the different markets that you—re trying to reach. It helps to have a design that can appeal to various cultural backgrounds and is accessible to (almost) everyone to visits your site, so follow the lead of Facebook or Amazon when it comes to creating an all-encompassing approach to your website.

- Become local

One thing you can easily do to appeal to a specific overseas market is to create a localized Top Level Domain (TLD) for each country or language.

- Ponder your keyword selection

You need to be sure that your SEO and PPC keywords that you use in copy and tags are properly researched for each target market. Also, it would help you to know what the successful keywords of their local competition are, as well as maybe using some specific, local terms along with your more generic words. And, please, make sure you test and analyze your selected keywords. You won—t be sorry.

THINGS NOT

TO FORGET

- Start small

To see both how well your translating skills are working and how your e-commerce business is going over in a new market, start by just offering a limited (and targeted) range of products when first launching your site overseas.

- Human translators work best

We—ve all seen the hours of mindless fun that can be had copy and pasting between various online translators, but I think you may want a bit more security when translating for your business. Poor grammar and awkward phrasing are off-putting for anyone, so make sure that you—re content is translated, or at the very least checked, by a professional, HUMAN translator before your site goes live.
